Chicago Journalism Review to fold

The Chicago Journalism Review, the first magazine produced entirely by reporters to criticize themselves and their bosses, will cease publication October 1. It had been founded in 1968 as an outgrowth of a meeting of Chicago journalists angered by what they felt was their newspapers' incomplete coverage of the bloodshed and street violence during the Democratic National Convention. The Review reached a peak circulation of 9,000 in 1970, but presently has only 2,500 subscribers. The Columbia Journalism Review has offered to assume debts, liabilities and the Chicago Review's subscription list. Dorfman estimates debts and liabilities at about $15,000.
